

Starting Point

Practical Strategies to start working with your young child with ASD

Date: 23rd, 30th January and 6th February 2012

Venue: Donard, Knockbracken Healthcare Park, Saintfield Road Belfast BT8 8BH

Course Outline:

- My Child's Autism

To begin to understand your child with an Autism Spectrum Disorder, one must first acknowledge their individuality – to know your child, you must understand Autism.

- Play

Teaching play skills at home at a young age will give your child the opportunity to develop the foundation blocks on which other skills can be developed, including communication, social interaction and social skills.

- Communication

For most children learning to communicate is exciting. It starts right from birth and should be fun for the child, their family and friends.

- Interaction

Social interaction is something that we take for granted. We believe that it should develop effortlessly. Social interaction involves skills like good eye contact, being able to share a book, a game or even a joke with one or more people. It is the ability to know how to speak or respond when someone speaks to you and to know when to be quiet and listen.

- Daily Living Skills

It is very important to teach your child positive social routines as early as possible. It is easier to introduce the correct way to do things now rather than try to change difficult behaviour later on. Family life with your child could be much easier if introduced to their part in daily living skills from the beginning.

- Positive Behaviour

There will be no one who has all the answers for you in dealing with difficult situations you might experience with your child. While there will be a number of professionals you can contact, it may be helpful to have some general advice about how to deal with problem situations, if and when they happen.

Course aimed at: Parents of children with ASD.
